Career and Scholarships

November 4th 8th, 2019

(Mainly in German, but there might be the opportunity for questions in English)

We would like to draw your attention to the career orientation week! The Career Service has invited representatives and graduates, to the following theme days:

- Monday: Non-university career paths for natural scientists (Scientist Instrument Development, Laboratory management in
- Tuesday: Cultural and political education work
- Wednesday: Training and Consulting
- Thursday: Science, research and teaching (University professorship
- Friday: Journalism, PR and Media

The aim of the event is, among other things, is to bring doctoral candidates together with successful practitioners in order to provide them with authentic insights into everyday working life, to inform them about potential fields of work, employers and entry routes. Space for individual questions, exchange and networking is provided!

The Welcome Centre announces a final degree scholarship for international doctoral candidates. Successful applicants receive a monthly stipend of €750 for one up to 6 months, starting immediately upon successful application. Prerequisites include a good academic record and the expectation that the degree will be granted within a year.

Final degree support is also intended to help international doctoral candidates who have come into financial difficulties – through no fault of their own – to concentrate on completing their studies.

Closing date for applications: 30 November 2019

Here you can find all necessary documents and information for your application (for international doctoral candidates):

CITEC - Lecture: Feedforward and feedback learning in human sensorimotor control

The human sensorimotor control system has exceptional abilities to perform skilful action despite ever changing conditions. The lecture will discuss how this adaptability can result through intrinsic mechanisms in two different ways: sensory feedback driving feedforward adaptation; and feedforward adaptation in turn adapting the feedback responses and tuning them to the environment.

In the first part of my talk I will examine how prior sensorimotor cues can be used to learn independent motor memories. These results suggest that motor memories are encoded not simply as a mapping from current state to motor command but are encoded in terms of the recent history of sensorimotor states. However, learning can also be used to adjust intrinsic feedback control. The second half of my talk will focus on a few recent studies examining feedback responses; demonstrating both how they are modulated for control and using them to probe the underlying mechanisms of visually guided reaching.
